The Krishna Rajendra market located in the city of Bengaluru, is one of the oldest public markets of the city dating back to the 1920s. Centrally located and well connected to the rest of the city, it boasts to be the city's largest supplier of vegetables and fruits. As a space that is frequented by the public extensively, the market is a key element when it comes to the identity of Bengaluru.

Over the years, K.R. Market has become congested, messy and is in complete disarray due to lack of proper maintenance and necessary infrastructure rendering it to be an unappealing and undesirable place to visit. The aim of the thesis is to understand the dynamics and workings of the market, how it conducts trade, utilises its spatial configuration and interacts with the people, in order for it to adapt itself to take upon the role of a new type of social space in the city for the future.
